
FOREWORD

The present Conservative Party leader, David Cameron, has more than once said that, if elected, a Conservative government would repeal the Human Rights Act 1998 and replace it with a British ‘Bill of Rights’ which would set out what would presumably be his government’s view of people’s responsibilities and rights.¹ The Brown government has taken a more measured stance, and, in an extraordinarily thoughtful document, has proposed retaining the Act, but supplementing it with a new ‘Bill of Rights and Responsibilities’.² It may be significant that the Chapter on ‘Responsibilities’ precedes that on ‘Rights’. The future of the Human Rights Act, and perhaps even of human rights as a juridical reality in the United Kingdom, may therefore seem to be somewhat uncertain. To produce a book at this time which analyses family law through the perspective of the Human Rights Act might therefore seem a bold move. But it can go a long way towards dispelling the kinds of myths and misunderstandings which build up an impetus of derision about ‘rights’, especially ‘human rights’.

And this is important. Why? We must not forget that the idea of individual rights in its modern form emerged during the 18th-century Enlightenment as part of the movement to restrict the absolutist powers of the ancien régime. It culminated most visibly in the American Declaration of Independence and the French Declaration of the Rights of Man, but was a driving feature in Condorcet’s Reflections on black slavery (1781) and his On the admission of women to the rights of citizenship (1790), in Gouges’ The rights of women (1791), in Wollstonecraft’s A vindication of the rights of women (1792) and in Paine’s Rights of man (1791). As the government’s Consultation Document rightly observes, claims such as these were about limitations on power.³ Bentham, however, de-bunked the idea of rights, or at least of ‘natural’ rights, probably as a reaction against their apparent contribution to the excesses of the French Revolution, and rights discourse became muted in the political conservatism of the 19th century (apart from a brief resurgence in mid-century), the great anti-slavery and franchise reforms being effected more through appeals to religious conscience or enlightened self-interest, and revolutionary socialism based more on claims about historical inevitability, than by claims about individual rights.⁴

Women had to wait over a century before the rights asserted for them in the 1790s were realised, although JS Mill, who wrote (in 1863) ‘if (a person) has what we consider a sufficient claim, on whatever account, to have something guaranteed to him by society, we say that he has a right to it’,⁵ readily referred to the ‘rights’ women had, or should have, in

¹ www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1092716/Cameron-calls-UK-Bill-Rights-Straw-reveals-plans-overhaul-Human-Rights-Act.html.

² Ministry of Justice, Rights and Responsibilities: Developing our Constitutional Framework (2009), 10 (referred to here as ‘Consultation Document’).

³ Consultation Document, para 3.2.

⁴ The word ‘rights’ does not even appear in the main text of the Communist Manifesto.

⁵ JS Mill, Utilitarianism (1863) ch 5.

his The Subjection of Women (1869). But the concept of individual rights struggled in the oppressive political climate of the first half of the 20th century.⁶ After the Second World War, the resurgence of rights discourse was more a strategy to try to protect individuals against any reversion to excessive centralisation of power than, as in earlier times, a means for re-distributing power. This perhaps explains the perception in the Consultation Document that modern human rights instruments seek stability in times of uncertainty. Nevertheless, appeals to individual rights remain significant aspects of recent and current movements to promote empowerment of various groups, such as married women, fathers, gay people and children.⁷

Of course, the nature and source of 'rights' remains problematic. My own view is that they are no more than instances where 'background' moral values are socially recognised as applying to specific circumstances in such a way that it is held that there is a social responsibility to bring about certain 'end-states' which are desired by their beneficiaries, or reasonably thought would be so desired. Casting these situations in terms of 'rights' implies an equal entitlement to the said 'end-state' for all persons in a similar position. Whether such social recognition of these entitlements exists can of course be heavily contested and that is why it is important that there should be trusted social institutions to resolve the contests. Social recognition need not necessarily mean simple 'majority opinion'. Indeed, it should not, because many rights would be worthless if they could be swept aside on the basis of public sentiment, as indeed the French Revolution and many other political events have demonstrated. Exactly how these rights are given institutional protection is a matter of constitutional governance, and varying solutions are possible, some more robust than others. The United Kingdom 'solution', embodied in the Human Rights Act, has a number of virtues. It locates the 'background' principles which sustain the rights in the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, and provides a process for their reasoned application to specific situations through forensic argument and judicial decision. It retains an ultimate check over the process by Parliament, although this in turn could be inhibited by conditions of membership of the Council of Europe. Obviously other models are possible.

But two features of any model seem to be particularly important. One is that individual rights should be capable of being legally enforced, even against the government. Rights are very different from responsibilities in this respect. For while it is undoubtedly true that many duties must be subject to legal enforcement (the duty to respect individual rights being an obvious case), there is a strong reason for holding that the performance of general responsibilities to one's community are often (but not always) better underwritten by appeals to altruistic behaviour (such as community spirit) than legal coercion, whereas rights can only be effectively protected by institutional mechanisms, like the law.⁸ The reason is that when states proclaim duties they think their citizens owe to their communities, and follow this up with force (or other coercive measures), the ambit of individual liberty narrows and can be seriously threatened. It is therefore comforting that the Consultation

⁶ See FA Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (1944), throughout, and especially pp 63–5.

⁷ See John Eekelaar, Family Law and Personal Life (2007) ch 6.

⁸ Ibid, ch 7.

Document strongly hints that any statement of responsibilities that ‘we all owe as members of UK society’ would not necessarily take the form of legally enforceable duties.⁹

Another feature of the model is that the nature and application of rights should be subjected to continual reasoned debate and evaluation. It is inevitable that this may become complex and difficult. But, as said earlier, the application of even agreed principles to concrete situations can be highly contested. That is the nature of individual rights, and it is naïve to expect otherwise. That is why the analysis of family law in the context of human rights provided in this book is so very important.

John Eekelaar
August 2009

<http://www.pbookshop.com>

⁹ Consultation Document, p 9.

CONTENTS

Foreword	v
Acknowledgements	viii
Abbreviations	xii
Table of Cases	xiii
Table of Legislation	xxix
Table of Conventions, Treaties, etc.	xxxvi
1. The European Convention on Human Rights and Family Law	1
An Introduction to the General Structure of the Convention Articles	1
The Relationship Between the Margin of Appreciation and Proportionality	26
2. The Human Rights Act: Scheme, Principles and Implementation	35
Section 2: Taking Strasbourg Jurisprudence into Account	38
Section 3: Statutory Interpretation under the HRA	44
Section 6—The Meaning of Public Authorities	54
Contracting out Services—the Significance for the Family and Family Law	65
Proportionality, Judicial Review and Deference	71
Deference, Discretionary Areas of Judgment and the Margin of Appreciation	76
Deference and Proportionality in the Context of Family Law	80
Proportionality and the Clash of Rights within Disputes Concerning Private Individuals	91
The Clash of Individual Article 8 Rights—the Children Act as a Case Study	94
Conclusion	96
3. Human Rights in Family Law	97
Introduction	97
Rights: Definitions and Understandings	98
What is a Right?	98
Hohfeld and Rights	100
Rights and Duties	100
Will v Interest Theory	102
Rights and Utilitarianism	103
What Is a Human Right?	106
The Benefits of a Rights-based Approach	108
Problems with a Human Rights Approach	114
Alternatives to Rights: Ethics of Care	122
Children and Rights	127
Conclusions	138

4. Marriage	140
Article 12	140
Transgender Persons	142
Same-sex Marriage	148
Restrictions upon the Right to Marry	155
The Role of Marriage in Creating ‘Family Life’ Under Article 8	167
5. Parenthood and Parental Rights: Intention, Family Life and the Parent	170
Fatherhood	171
Motherhood	198
Parents and Respect for Family Life	205
Parental Rights and Responsibility	206
6. Children’s Rights	221
Children’s Rights under the ECHR	221
United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child	225
Children’s Rights under the Children Act 1989	227
Balancing Children’s Rights and Adults’ Rights	232
Children’s Rights and Corporal Punishment	237
Access to Courts	239
Conclusions	241
7. Private Law Children Cases: A Rights Perspective	242
Introduction	242
Contact and the ECHR	243
The English Courts’ Approach to Contact	254
Application of the ECHR Principles to English Law	261
Grandparents and Other Relatives	270
Religious Issues	276
Relocation	282
Conclusion	285
8. Human Rights and Child Protection	286
Introduction	286
Children’s Rights to Protection from Abuse	287
When a Local Authority May Take a Child into Care	299
Procedural Rights in Child Protection Law	309
Contact with Children in Care	316
Liability of the Local Authority where it wrongly Intervenes	318
Secure Accommodation Orders	323
Adoption and the Human Rights Act	323
Conclusion	339
9. Domestic Violence: The Extent of the Problem and the Recognition and Use of a Human Rights Discourse	342
Current Responses and Issues Concerning Domestic Violence in the UK	346
The Impact of the European Convention on Human Rights and the Human Rights Act 1998—the Right to Protection from Violence	348
Conclusions on the Right to Protection from Violence	394

10. Financial Disputes and Human Rights	396
Ancillary Relief	396
Child Support Issues	411
Property Rights and Unmarried Couples	417
Inheritance	423
Conclusion	426
11. Concluding Thoughts	427
The Importance of Recognising Rights in Family Law	427
Summary of the Chapters	428
Issues Outstanding	432
Looking Backwards and Forwards	433
Conclusion	435
Index	436

<http://www.pbookshop.com>